

Jay Haueter Barn

After World War II ended, Jay Haueter, with the help of his father, Frederick Otto Haueter, built this barn which is still in his possession, located just north of East Main Street in Midway. He hauled lumber out of the mountains and purchased cinder blocks from Buehner Blocks in Salt Lake to build his barn in the 1940s. Some of the beams in the ceiling came from floor joists out of the old tithing building located on Main Street at 1st North, location of a service station now. His home next to the barn was partially built from lumber that came from a couple of barracks that he tore down in Vernal. He said that the lumber from those barracks was excellent material.

When the barn was finished, Jay went into the dairy business. He

The barn is still in use today by Jay to store the hay he grows there. It feeds a few horses, and once in awhile calves or some small animals raised by grandchildren.

Jay was very resourceful in building his barn without it costing an excessive amount of money. Many of the buildings of that era were built on a shoestring, but with quality lumber, and have held up very well.
